

A Message from Dan Manginelli

Are Your Opportunities Disguised As Obstacles?

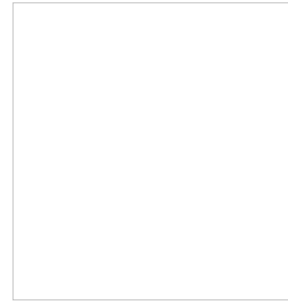

Each day no matter what we do in life and career we are faced with obstacles. Some are bigger hurdles than others, but they all exist. The wild thing about these difficulties is they are a mask hiding big opportunities. When we face change in our lives or business, our first instinct is to resist it. Resistance is immediately followed by blame. We decide whose fault it is and then share with everyone who will listen how we are affected by the change. This brings others into our problems which then fuels the problem fire because they're glad it is our problem and not theirs. It may even make their problems seem not so bad.

It is the achievers in life and business who can look at each of these hindrances, take that proverbial deep breath, and identify how to make it work to their advantage. It could be as simple as becoming more educated on the subject and providing others direction if they experience the same challenges. I know for me in business when things change and there are obstacles it immediately separates me from the competition. Why? Because while others are still trying to assess blame, I am working to accept the change, solve problems and educate my team to move forward. Many people live their lives as victims of circumstance. Achievers are successful because they embrace change and make it work for them.

This week rip the mask off of your obstacles and reveal the opportunities. This can be a game changer for your attitude, which will carry over in your business and all your relationships. Find the best and make this week count!
